GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

What is a Non-Compete Agreement?

A non-compete agreement is a legal document stipulating that one party will not compete in the same industry or geographical area with another party. Often, a non-compete agreement is signed at the time a company hires an employee. The contract can also be used between companies and vendors, freelancers, and entered into after an employee has already worked with the company for any amount of time.

Generally, a non-compete protects a business' relationships with customers and their intellectual property. This keeps a former employee or contractor from taking contacts or information they learned through the company and opening their own business. It also protects the company from having former employees take contacts or information and going to work for a competitor.

When Do I Need One?

A non-compete agreement goes into effect once the employee or contractor severs ties with the company. There are a few ways that a company can draw up non-compete agreements and a few scenarios in which they would be useful:

- When a new employee is hired.
- When a company finds they need the agreement due to the sensitive nature of information an employee sees.
- When purchasing a company from a previous owner.

The Consequences of Not Using One

Employees are the most valuable part of your company. Depending on the level and specialization of the employee, they often know your business and industry intricately. This knowledge helps them to make your company successful. But given to a competing entity, it could prove to be a distinct disadvantage to your organization.

Without a non-compete agreement in place, a key employee could leave and would likely stay in the area and in the same industry. While companies can't stop employees from moving on or working in the field, they also shouldn't risk intellectual property or insider knowledge being used against them. Here are some possible outcomes without this document in place:

- An employee could leverage their knowledge of your company to secure a high ranking position with your direct competition.
- An employee could use knowledge gained through your company to open their own competing enterprise.
- An employee could leave and hire away key employees.

The Most Common Uses

Traditionally, non-compete agreements were created for high ranking employees and those with specialized knowledge of your business. More and more, companies are using non-compete agreements for a larger swath of their staff. Often new hires will need to sign a non-compete agreement in order to secure the position.

Non-compete agreements need to be very specific in what they prohibit. A company can't stand in the way of a former employee's ability to earn an income - that wouldn't be enforceable nor should it be. For this reason, the non-compete needs to specify a region and specific industry or type of position that the staff member couldn't take up directly after leaving. For instance, if you had a non-compete agreement in the city of Chicago, it might only include companies within city limits and not the extended suburbs. The time limit on the non-compete agreement should also be reasonable - usually one year or two year terms.

What Should the Agreement Include?

An enforceable non-compete agreement needs to be drafted carefully. Agreements that are too wide geographically or restrictive without clear reasoning may not be enforced should the situation ever arise. Here are some things that must be considered:

- Compensation
- Geographic Region
- Industry
- Employee Specialization
- Assignment Provision
